Cranky Notions.

No man has any right to exclude another from any portion of the earth unless he compensates that other for exclusion," says W. E. Bokow, Single Taxer, in an article in Single-Tax syndicate papers.

Suppose two men were in a boat and that all the boat would hold, would a third man be entitled to an equal share of the boat, assuming the boat had been found and was not the result of the work of any of the three? What right is it to divide the third man who has to the boat? Suppose there is an island in the middle of the ocean capable of supporting one hundred persons and one hundred persons are cultivating the soil and making their home there, and ten or fifteen others come from some other place and want to live on the island, what rights have these latter to the land which one hundred are bound in equity and justice to respect?

Suppose, again, one hundred, or more, or less, settle on no more land than they need to support their own life and comfort, where do any other persons get any right whatever to the land occupied or any of its products?

If a person now use more of nature's materials and forces than are sufficient to maintain the existence and comfort of himself and those dependent upon him, where do others get the right, in justice and equity, to dispossess him unless he gives up a portion of the products which are the result of his own labor?

I would like to have some Single Taxer answer these questions. Much may depend on their correct answer.

And now some of our reformer friends are to save the world by the Initiative and Referendum. If this system is of such importance to the welfare of the people, why is not Switzerland a paradise? It is true, Switzerland has many things beneficially affecting the people's welfare, not obtaining even in other republics, or the kind of majorities. The majorities could have for reformers to aim at that political change? Capital punishment was abolished in Switzerland in 1874, but there is now a probability that it will be reënacted, and by the Initiative and Referendum, too. If the majority under that Initiative political system voted that twice two is six or that the earth is flat, it certainly would not make them so. But it would show that this is the object of the people who fully comprehend the problem, or who even understands it fairly well. The essence of the movement is to obtain political liberty, but it rarely is a political liberty to be governed by the whims of others, even though they be in the majority. Why should the majority govern any more than the minority? This is a question I have never had answered, satisfactorily, If the will of others is to be the law which is to govern me, I do not know an instance, much difference whether it be that of the biggest or the littlest crowd. In the trades unions, where the Initiative and the Referendum prevail, I have seen the greatest injustice done by the majority, without any law of others.

majority approve of the law or not, so long as they let me be governed by it. It will take you no longer to learn this truth than to learn the fallacy of the Initiative and the Referendum as efficient means of justice.

Interest Just and Unjust.

In the address of Mr. Hugo Bilgram (Labor of April 25) is found much to approve. What he says about the interest on privileged money can be questioned by no honest criticism. It is simply unjust. Whether there is not interest of another kind, and other sources which produce monopolistic interest are quite other questions. To me it seems plain that there are economic conditions which produce interest independent of monopoly, and that there are several monopolies, besides that of money, which bear an unjust interest.

Patient right; government privilege to follow certain productive callings and to buy and sell goods, are joint factors with privileged money in yielding excessive interest. And beneath all lies the legal protection to unlimited dominion of the land. Whether the government enacts the number of the slaves in the country, or prescribes the number of shoemakers, the people will have to pay the interest on profit, and suffer the levies in the same fashion as the slaves when compelled to hire money to a privileged bank.

It is far worse when the government yields up to the control of the class who are able to buy into it, the dominion of all the fruit yielding land to the exclusion of the people, who have now to hire the natural sources of all wealth.

Nor do I quite agree with him in that interest-bearing power is the profit-bearing power upon capital. On the contrary, I am quite sure that capital, particularly labor, could not be bought at all with money which bore no interest, because, in the absence of any capitalized land would be let to the laborer, as was done in all its without valuation in the terms of money at all, for a part of the annual produce of the labor applied. I do not that interest would continue, if lawful money was abolished and all debts, and credits lost free. If one owns a farm from which he cannot raise more than a bare subsistence, he can pay no interest to mortgagee or banker. No one hires money for its own sake. All know it to be barren. So far as a direct exchange is concerned, it matters not whether money be cheap or dear. The simulative exchanges will be affected in the same way. The terms in money make no difference to the relative values of the things exchanged. It is only when one wants to buy and has nothing to buy with that he needs to borrow money. It is not the producer as such, but only the borrower, who suffers wrong. It is only the lender who is benefited.

But there is a variable, rate of interest, profit, or rent, arising from the use of capital, not at all attributable to legal monopolies of any kind, but which capitalism has sustained by the aid of "appropriate legislation" in engrossing. It is the whole product of labor, save a bare support to the laborer, or, what is nearly the same thing, the difference between what he would produce co-operating with the capital, or by working without it. The interest, rent, and profit, which the laborer can pay no interest on money legal or free, or indeed effect any product whatever. Hence unconditional dominion of the land is the ultimate source of all tributary interest, rent, or profits, the three being different in name. Beside the tributary increment, the same thing appears under economic law, released from the State class laws, and which arises from the ability of labor to produce more than it consumes, and which, normally, under equal freedom, becomes the property of the laborer, and is therefore not inequitable, because productive of the general industrial prosperity.

Gary vs. the Supreme Court.

William M. Sutter, writing in the Philadelphia "Conservator," raises a new point with reference to the remarkable apology of Judge Gary in the "Century," for the verdict in the "Chicago Anarchist" case, in the following language:

Judge Gary's defense of the verdict is virtually this: that the persons tried had said violent, inflammatory language, examples of which he gives at great length; that they were partners to a conspiracy to overthrow law and order; that it is inconceivable that the throwing of the bomb on the 4th of May, 1886, was not the result of the ravings and the plottings referred to; and hence that the whole body of the conspirators were accessories to the act of throwing and responsible for it.

It will be remembered that the case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Illinois. It is interesting to see that the opinion of this Court follows a somewhat different line of reasoning from that which Judge Gary pursues. In the trial in Chicago much evidence was produced to show that the accused persons had not only talked or written a wild, bloody-thirsty way, and were not only members of the general conspiracy known as the International Association, but that they had entered into a special and particular conspiracy to contain a violent deed on or about the 4th of May, and had incited and inflamed the passions of men directly to that end. The Supreme Court in its opinion reviews all this evidence. Three-quarters of the opinion is given to a discussion of it. In the eyes of the Supreme Court it evidently bore vitally on the case. And because it judged the evidence to be valid, it refused to reverse the decision of the lower court. In other words, however, in which Judge Gary now defends the verdict did not apparently satisfy the Supreme Court of Illinois. On the other hand, the evidence which the Supreme Court treated at such length is not so much as mentioned in Judge Gary's present article. This is nothing less than extraordinary. And yet it should be said it is on the worth and conclusiveness of this special evidence that most of the questioning of the justice of the verdict turns. No one can deny the facts to which Judge Gary alludes, nor can any one question that the Anarchists by talking and writing as they did committed a grave offense. But what one may question, and what many have questioned, is whether they had any such direct connection with the wild act of the night of the 4th of May as the Supreme Court of Illinois judged they had to have had. It is, perhaps, not too much to say that Judge Gary is more or less entitled to the conclusiveness of the evidence bearing on this point, and for this reason does not allude to it. Yet, if this evidence is inconclusive, the Supreme Court was in error, and, according to its important standards of judgment, the men should not have been hung. In brief, Judge Gary is skeptical of the ground which the Supreme Court took; and the Supreme Court is (was) skeptical of the premise of the opinion. In public, it is not likely to be reassured by the apparent divergence of opinion in high circles that a wrong was not committed by the hanging of the men.

"In abolishing rent and interest, the last cliffs of old-time slavery, the last fencings to shut out the sun and air of the country, the doors of the poor, the gates of the condemned, the springs of the department, all those towns of fetters which gang up Liberty's grorses beneath her heel."—Paine.

The appearance in the editorial column of articles over other signatures than the editor's initial indicates that the editor approves their central purpose and general trend, though he does not hold himself responsible for every phrase or word. But the appearance in other parts of the paper of articles by the same or other writers by no means indicates that he disapproves them in any respect such disposition of them being governed largely by motives of convenience.

Spencer and George.—IV.

On the subject of compulsion to landlords on abolition of their ownership, George says: "The free principle is involved in every question which has already, or may soon become, of practical importance." This avows curiosity without satisfying it. He refers to slavery, pensions, protection by the tariff and inventions. It is easy to separate them into past and present or future questions.

"It is not," says George, "a question of all right of compensation. That the State should compensate when it destroys a building to make way for a public improvement, or takes goods or provisions or horses or shipping for which it may have such a demand, is one thing; and when it does not demand of others, is not in question. The right of compensation in such cases is not disputed."

He makes no protest against the State's demanding of some citizens' services which it does not demand of others. Suppose such services involve the loss of life? The demand certainly has first deriv'd liberty. Compensation may then be made to the heirs of the murdered captives. No compensation is possible to the victims. Their liberty and life were unique, and they, being dead, are incapable of taking compensation, were it possible to ascertain what it should be. Hence we see that George professes willingness to give compensation where it is not possible. "Let us see whether the case where he refuses it is on the ground of alleged impossibility: it is not rather a possible case. In order to shut out compulsion to landholders George gives prominence to the definition that compensation means an equivalent for the thing taken. He follows with glee the vagaries of Spencer in "Justice" keeping up pre-sessions on behalf of the landlords to show that that compensation as they claim it would be impossible. The equivalent of an interest-bearing fund is another interest-bearing fund as large. If George has seen the truth, he has suppressed it.

"Id be pedantic to cite passages in which George, in his doctrine that the earth belongs in usufruct to each succeeding generation. If this doctrine be accepted, the alleged impossibility of reasonable compensation disappears; for those who hold that the State adequately represents society and that the earth belongs to each generation of society can well admit that an alienation of the use of a given portion of the earth for a generation is within the capacity and discretion of the representative organization of society and plainly distinguishable from an alleged alienation of use from future generations, which is neither possible, nor can adequate consideration have been received for it, nor received by the true owners to come. Hence I reason that, if the ownership be held to run by generations, George could have easily found a way out of the difficulty, which he purposely conceals with his imaginations can make it by refusing to draw upon his reason and to call his own doctrine."

He delights in comparing land taking with theft or with bounties which have been got for nothing. People take slave property at their risk, he says. Certainly they do; but, if a State had sold slaves to its citizens, they would say, that so far as the lawyer's relation to the State was concerned, the risk stated was a risk of repudiation of a warranty,—a proceeding which is at war with society's innermost claim to continuity, or if, as suggested by a former remark of George's, it would have been necessary, then compensation would be in order. Now, according to George's own doctrines and those almost universally received the occupancy of land is as right in itself as the holding of slaves is wrong in itself. If a State had sold slaves and received pay for them, the owner would have an equitable claim against the State, in case of State action for emancipation, no matter for the right of the slave to be free. The landowner could rest on this ground without saying anything of the rightfulness of his possession in contrast with the case between him and the State is not to be confused with the case between him and other persons, the State being out of the way. If I hold a United States bond, none of you as individuals owe me anything; but who says that the United States government is not bound to pay me? George has argued as if the absence of individual obligation to pay the bond were warrant for the government, in spite of its having got my money, to repudiate the bond. It sold me land; nobody need respect its title; therefore it need not respect that title. Such a government owes nothing to decency; then, or it would abolish and let the individuals repudiate its contracts in stead of having the exfronty to continue in existence as their agents in the repudiation.

It is tolerably evident that there floats in George's mind the idea of an interest-bearing fund equivalent to the selling value of the land on the assumption that this generation has the right and power to bind all future generations, and that the rate of interest will not decrease. By the aid of this assumption, which is in conflict with what is involved in the right and power of generation, he gleefully forces his way to the foreground conclusion that compensation—a full equivalent for the franchise taken—is impossible.

Spencer at the last, for the purpose of sustaining the landlords or else in Larresque, has figured out in his way that compensation would not be remunerative. Neither of them has adhered to the line of inquiry as to what there is to compensate for that can be reached, according to their premises.

George indeed pretends that he would not dispossess anybody. This, however, only means that the owner could stay as a tenant because the State could have no preference as to persons. It is, therefore, a statement that the owner of the nut is welcome still to hold the nutshell.

Ownership for use and legal ownership for speculation are thrown together, and the tax from the former may go to hire troops to keep the people from trespassing upon the latter, by George's plan. The unrepentant State, after swindling people by selling land to them for all time, would evict them from their immovable property even of an hour when it would well afford to stand by its bargain reduced to reason according to the promise of a generation's tenure. This result will follow in cases where the improvements were not of a kind to yield the pecuniary returns to which the location could be turned, and when the owner had not the surplus capital and knack to make the change which another might stand ready to make, who could look complacently upon existing improvements, not of a money-making character, as things to be torn up and thrown aside.

Tak Wak.

Norr.—If the editor will compare what I said about nuts in my last article with what he states that I said, he may see a difference. The compiler of the nut in the case generally acquaints it on the expectation that he will return service. The nut is distinct evidence of co-operative work. At the same time it is fresh in the eyes of the people that has built who have never lived to return a full equivalent. It is known that no exact repayment is stipulated. I think that a person is as truly the owner of what he requires by exchange or services as that he makes plane, but I think the evidence of others' work will often be more distinct to observation than the evidence of their payment.

Community aid in building a young couple a hut gives them the hut at once, and it may be years before the man has done enough at odd times to square the debt. If he dies young, the aid that has been given him goes as a donation. The people generally are al ready in possession of the hut, except for insurance or to get aid in building huts for their children, it is not known that they expect anything except good fellow-ship. Of course, when it is the fact that a man has helped to build many huts,—that is, when he has taken care of his friends and is a community recognizes that he has paid for the hut he had built for him.

Why Abolish Interest?

To the Editor of Liberty:

Although I have been a careful reader of your interesting paper for something over a year, I have so confess my incapacity to understand why you advocate the abolition of rent and interest, and I hope you will consider me a pupil willing to learn if Liberty can furnish a teacher. At the present time I will explain how rent and interest appear to me, as, if you know what fallacies I am unearthing, it will greatly facilitate you in undertaking their overthrow. Instead of the "last man's all time slave" and the interest seem to me to be useful instruments of mutual accommodation between man and man, by the use of which one who has accumulated something which the other has not can exchange it. It seems to me to me in a manner compromising the dignity of neither. To illustrate, here is a cook who by her labors has saved a handsome sum of money which she is glad to have a house built with, and she will not be content until she has a house built. Here is a young man whose labors have enabled him to build a little house. Suddenly a prospect presents himself of his taking a share in a promising business if he can contribute a share of capital sufficient to pay his portion of the expenses until the profits of the business can be divided. Two opportunities for raising the needed capital presented themselves; a man who has no house of his own, and who does not wish to build one, offers to pay him rent for the privilege of temporarily living in his house, and the cook's money can be borrowed for temporary use if he will pay her something for the use of the kitchen, through the bank which furnishes him. The bank as the negotiator between borrower and lender justly receives a portion of the interest. This, as it seems to me, is a fair sample of the whole social structure of which so kindly oppose. If we suppose that the cook sets up an employment bureau, makes a song of little fortune by her efforts and good management, leaves to it her daughter, who spends capital; or the leader of that store-up labor that her mother's wages is here in this? I dare say I may seem to you very ignorant and superficial; but, at least, I know enough to want to know, and you will kindly enlighten me, you may be as severe on my stupidity as you choose.

As Enquirer.

My enquiring friend is by no means stupid. Her argument is well and clearly stated and is indicative of the habit of thought. Neither is she ignorant or superficial in the sense in which those terms are usually employed for the general characterization of personality. She has simply failed to acquaint herself with the position of the Anarchist opponents of interest, the soundness of which her innate power of penetration will enable her to see when once she has become familiar with it.

Wherein consists her misapprehension? In this, -- that she supposes the Anarchists to condemn the contract between the borrower and the lender, per se; whereas the truth is that they condemn not the contract, but the conditions of compulsory restriction and limitation under which such contract is now necessarily made at all, and in the absence of which it would be prevented, not by law or by invasion of any kind, but by simple competition, from embalming the element of interest on capital.

Take the case which she cites. No Anarchist disputes that it is perfectly legitimate for the young man in question to borrow either of the cook or of the bank upon such terms as may be agreed upon in a free market. The complaint of Anarchism is that the market is not free, and then the transactions effected therein are necessarily tainted with injustice. At present, if the young man borrows, whether from the cook or from the bank, the terms of the contract are dictated, to his disadvantage, by means of a legal privilege exercised by the one who is the bank, entirely a monopolist. He cannot borrow from a non-monopoly bank, unless he can give a note with redemption of which is considered sure and is generally made sure by a lien upon actual property. Upon being thus secured, the lender supplies the borrower with other notes, intrinsically no stronger, but in the redemption of which not only the lender and borrower but the entire community have reason to have confidence. That is to say, the lender, either by issuing his own universally known notes or by furnishing equally well known notes previously issued by others, virtually infringes the borrower's note, or, in still other words, insures his credit. For this service what does he charge? A price as low as that for which any one else is willing and able to perform the same service. Now, the Anarchists assert that there are large numbers of people who are willing, either individually or by forming themselves into banking associations, to perform this service at something less than one per cent., and that the only reason why they are not able to do so at that there is no one prevented by law. The grounds upon which they base this assertion are, first, the fact that prices in a free market tend toward cost of production and performance, which, in the matter of insurance of credit, is shown by banking statistics to be about one-half of one per cent., and, second, the existence of Federal laws imposing a tax of ten per cent. on all banks of issue not complying with the provisions of the national banking act, and of State laws making it a crime to circulate counterfeit currency; or which specifically authorized by statute. To this it is no answer to say that all persons are equally free to comply with the provisions of the national banking act; or that for these provisions by their very nature, limiting the basis of currency to government bonds, limit the volume of the currency, and in any business a limitation which reduces the output as truly a restriction of competition as a limitation specifying that only certain persons shall engage in the business. Now, if the above facts and the assertions based on them are correct, it is obvious that, but for these, the price of insuring credit would fall to less than one per cent., this small percentage paying, not dividends to stockholders, but the salaries of banking officials, providing for incidental expenses, and making good any deficiencies from bad debts. This is justified the Anarchist contention that interest upon capital is dependent upon the restrictions surrounding the contract between borrower and lender; for surely "An Enquirer's" young men would not be willing to pay the cook six percent for money when he could borrow of a bank for one per cent, or be able to exact ten percent for his loans from a lessors man when the latter could hire money at one per cent, with which i buy or build a house.

If there is a flaw in the Anarchistic argument, I wait for "An Enquirer" to point it out. For her sake I have told an old story to the readers of Lib., but then I expect to have it told many times again.

A New Conception of Interest.

The article on interest by J. K. Ingalls, printed in another column, does not seem to me to be written in its author's usual clear style. Some of his positions are true without qualification, but others can be regarded as true only if we change the word interest in an entirely new sense. If rent and profit are to be considered interest, then it is true that "there are several monopolies, besides that of money, which bear an unjust interest;" I presume that this would be readily admitted by Mr. Bilgrim, whom Mr. Ingalls is criticizing. This, however, is not a very serious departure from economic terminology.

More violent is the use of the word interest to express the entire extra product resulting from labor's use of capital. If I, who can produce only ten without a spade, succeed in producing twenty with a borrowed spade, for the use of which I pay six, then in Mr. Ingall's view, if I understand him, the interest on the spade includes not only the six paid for its use, but the entire extra ten produced by its use. This is intelligible, but to me it is novel. So defining interest, one finds no difficulty in granting, again, that "there are economic conditions which produce interest independent of monopoly." And since Mr. Ingalls appears to admit that under equal freedom the entire extra ten would fall to me as laborer, and that six would no longer go to the owner of the spade, I am not at all disposed to dispute the justice of interest.

rest of a defined, and far, in desiring to abolish it, hope to see it vastly multiplied.

But I wonder if Mr. Ingall uses the word in this sense when he says that "capital, particularly land, could not be bought at all with money which bore no interest." If so, then still again can I understand and agree with him. For in this sense money that bears no interest means simply money that does not contribute to labor's power of production, and such money is necessarily representative of no property whatever, has no power to circulate, and will not be taken in exchange for anything of value. But thus interpreted the statement is so insignificant that Mr. Ingalls must, it seems to me, have used the word in its usual sense. In that case, however, insignificance is simply replaced by absurdity. For what can be more absurd than to say that a non-interest-bearing note, based upon specific property and for the redemption of which said property can be legally seized, will not be taken in exchange for other property, approximating in value that of the property serving as security for the note? It is indeed conceivable that, if the money monopoly were abolished and land monopoly remained, land would rise in value, but it cannot be held for a moment, with any show of reason, that it would bear no interest.

One of the letters to the Editor, findings that the co-op movement has been ineffective in the battles of the World War, as it was the case in the last war, and that it is not the case in the present war.

Taine on Taxation.

Few people are aware, I presume, that Hippolyte Taine, one of the greatest of French intellects, was virtually an Anarchist. His attitude toward the State may be seen in the following extract from one of his works.

The State makes use of the money which it extorts from me to unjustly impose fresh constraints upon me; this is the case when it proscribes for its theology or its philosophy, when it prescribes for me or denounces me a special form of religious worship, when it pretends to regulate my morals and my manners, to limit my labor or my expenditure, to fix the price of my merchandise or the rate of my wages. With the coin which I do not owe it and which it steals from me it defrays the expense of the persecution which it inflicts upon me. Let us beware of the encroachments of the State, and suffer it to be nothing more than a watch-dog.

Force and Justice.

[Peculiar.]

Had we been able, we should have put force in the hands of justice, but, as force, being a palpable quality, does not suffer us to dispose of it at will, whereas justice, being a spiritual quality, is thus disposable, we must have put justice in the hands of force, and thus we call that just which people are forced to observe.

The Source of Exploitation.

In good political has been found the secret of causing the c.o. die of hunger who, by cultivating the land, sustain the life of others.
The Sociological Index.

THE SOCIOLOGICAL INDEX is a classified weekly catalogue of the most important articles relating to sociology which appeared in the principal American and British periodicals of the world. The articles thus catalogued are clipped from the periodicals and filed, and these clippings are for sale in accordance with the following schedule of prices:

Ordinary articles - 15 cents each.
Articles marked * - 30 cents.
Articles marked  - 45 cents.
Articles marked  - 75 cents.

Any person can obtain as many of these clippings as he may desire by sending an order, accompanied by payment.

BENJ. R. TUCKER, Box 312, New York City.

In order, he may specify the catalogue number of the article desired, its title simply.

COUPONS FOR ORDERING CLIPPING.

To facilitate ordering and to make frequent remittances of cash unnecessary, coupons are for sale to subscribers who desire clippings. Each of these coupons is good for a 5-cent article. Two coupons will procure a 10-cent article, thus a 25-cent article, and five a 5-cent article.

COUPON PRICES.

One Coupon - 10 cents.
Seven Coupons - 1.00.
One Hundred Coupons - 12.50.

Holders of coupons have only to fill in the blanks with name and address, and the number of the article wanted. Coupons thus filled out can be mailed, singly or in groups, to Benj. R. Tucker, and he will send the desired clippings in exchange for them. Purchasers are strongly advised to use the coupons, thereby saving time, trouble, and money.
